THE DIGITAL CHALLENGE:

HOW TO HUMANIZE TECHNOLOGY

EXPLORING THE PROMISES & PITFALLS OF OUR COMMON DIGITAL FUTURE

HILTON PASADENA, CALIFORNIA, USA, 2 - 3 AUGUST 2019

Suggested Themes:

We live in an era of computerization of everyday life. Automation pervades all aspects of work and leisure, from the shop floor to education and dating services, with limitless possibilities for instant communication via iPhones, the Internet, and social media. But, is humanity becoming overly dependent on machines? Meredith Broussard cautions in Artificial Unintelligence (2018) that “computers misunderstand the world.” Simon Head points out in Mindless (2014) that smarter machines are “making dumber humans,” and that the age of machines as labor-saving devices has intensified management control of employees via Taylorism or “scientific management.” Humanoid robots pose an even greater challenge. For example, how can humans avoid emotional attachment and dependence on their creations, as explored in Sherry Turkle’s experiments with children and robots, and epitomized by the individual willing to “marry” his iPhone? The question arises: In a world dominated by machines, what is the proper role for humans? Kentaro Toyama proposes in Geek Heresy (2015) that technology is Janus-faced and that genuine social progress depends on caring humans. The future of humanity may well depend on scientists’ and humanists’ willingness and ability to bridge C. P. Snow’s famous The Two Cultures (1959) conceptual divide in order to humanize technology and promote individual fulfillment and social felicity in the global village.
